Chapter 4 – Wolf (Resolution)

I couldn't believe it. Renwood was going to fight the men who had captured us to earn our freedom – fighting for our freedom. The next morning, I rose from my bed of hay and peered through the bars of my cage into the crowded village. Excitement swarmed through the crowds as they yapped about the impending doom that my friend was going to face. How could anyone be excited at the prospect of two young boys fighting to the death?

We descended into a valley of oak, ash and pine and we soon reached the large silver river. I could smell the woodsmoke from the firewood that was lit in front of me. After a while, the ear-splitting chanting began and I caught sight of Renwood as he entered the centre of the circle. His face was expressionless but I knew he was afraid. The crunching of bones could be heard above the noise of the crowd. A cry was let out from one of the fighters. Was that Renwood? Was he injured? The horrifying scent of blood filled my nostrils. I began to howl softly and could barely breathe. I wanted to help him but was constrained by the stone cage. My lungs were crashing. I dug my claws into the ground beneath me.

"And the winner is..." I put my paws over my head in despair. I couldn't bear to hear it. I couldn't bear to hear that Renwood was dead. "Renwood!"

Chapter 5 – Renwood (Ending)

Finally the torture was over. The days passed peacefully so we lit a fire and set up in the Wolf Camp. I recognised the spot as the very place where my father had passed away months before. Wondering if he was looking down on me now, I glanced up into the night sky and admired the twinkling stars which were smiling back at me. I let out a soft yawn and Wolf settled down by my feet in front of the warm fire. I patted his furry head and chuckled to myself quietly. Why did he always insist on being so close to the fire when we decided –

SCREECH! BONG! BANG!

I spun my head with a jolt and heard a familiar roar. It was getting even closer! My heart felt like it had leaped into my mouth. I didn't move an inch. I heard the loud footsteps charging towards me. The sparrows fluttering away. The Yarrow leaves being plucked from the trees they belonged to. Then... silence...

Instantly, I caught sight of a pair of familiar, yellow eyes... (Ending with a cliffhanger)
